The U.S. spends more on healthcare services than most industrialized nations but has some of the worst health outcomes. We spend the less on social supports and have some of the highest need. In transforming our disease focused systems into quality health outcomes and value based community networks we must begin the hard work of decentralizing healthcare organizations, building interdisciplinary community based partnerships with nonmedical providers of social solutions and shifting the paradigm of power back into the hands of the consumer. We will explore the true impact of the Social Determinants of Health.
